PRESS RELEASE
For immediate release, Friday 23 October 2026

The tree in your living room is a political object. Twenty-eight artists explain why.

All Trees Are Political, from the Arborealists and invited artists, opens in Margate during National Tree Week and comes to the Batsford Gallery in Hackney for the run up to Christmas.

Every December we fell a young conifer, carry it into the house and hang lights on it, and most of us never ask why. All Trees Are Political: Particularly at Christmas, an exhibition of twenty-eight artists curated by the Margate artist Philippa Beale, asks that question. It opens at the Schwartzman Gallery, The Margate School, on Tuesday 24 November 2026, inside National Tree Week, and moves to the Batsford Gallery on Hackney Road, London, from Friday 11 to Sunday 20 December. Admission is free and every work is for sale, with prices from under £300.

The show takes the Christmas tree back to its roots. For thousands of years people have brought greenery indoors in the darkest months as a sign of life, renewal and protection: the fir and spruce of the Christmas tree, with its Germanic and solstice ancestry; holly and ivy in homes and churches; Tu BiShvat, the Jewish New Year for Trees; tulsi, the holy basil tended at the centre of Hindu homes. Different faiths, one shared instinct. Beale's claim is that the instinct is older than any of them, and that a tree is never only a tree: it is land, memory, faith and power, which is why it is political.

Philippa Beale says: "We bring trees indoors in the darkest month because something in us needs them close. That instinct is older than any of our religions and shared by all of them. Twenty-eight artists have each followed it somewhere I did not expect."

The exhibition image is Annabel Cullen's lithograph Remnant, Oaks Park (1). Georgina Allen, who lives and works in Surrey and won first prize in En Plein Air at Rye Art Gallery in 2025, shows Wimbledon Common, a painting about the pleasure of being in one place at one time. Robert Amesbury Brooks, taught at the Slade by Euan Uglow, shows Trees at Throop, in which a tree is a matter of structure, colour and light before it is scenery. Frank Creber paints a willow that came down on a house and stopped short of catastrophe, and asks who is responsible for the risks we have learned to live with. The Kent artists in the show include the curator herself and Joanna Hyslop.

The Arborealists were founded in 2013 by the painter Tim Craven, for many years curator at Southampton City Art Gallery, and have exhibited across Britain since, with the tree as their subject. Their 2024 exhibition at the Batsford Gallery launched Forests, Woods and Groves: Art from the Arborealists (Batsford), written by Beale and longlisted for the 2025 Wainwright Prize for Illustrative Books. Invited artists join the group for this show.

Beale's own thread through the exhibition began in Gibraltar. While curating Traces of Humanity there and in Margate earlier this year, she worked with Professor Geraldine Finlayson, who with her husband Professor Clive Finlayson has led the excavation of the Gorham's Cave Complex, the Neanderthal site inscribed by UNESCO in 2016. "Families walking together, with trees of every kind in view," Beale says of the people who lived there. "We have an innate inclination to keep searching for Eden. The artists in this show are recreating it through their art."

The exhibition opens at the Schwartzman Gallery, the contemporary art space at The Margate School on Margate High Street, named for the school's patron Arnold Schwartzman OBE, the Margate-raised designer and Academy Award winning filmmaker. It runs until Saturday 5 December. The private view is on Friday 27 November, 6 to 8pm, and Beale gives a talk, Being with Trees: 45 exhibitions in 13 years, at 3pm on Saturday 28 November. The show then moves to the Batsford Gallery at 266 Hackney Road, with a private view on Saturday 12 December, 2 to 5pm, and the talk is repeated at 3pm on Saturday 19 December. Two books and a catalogue are on sale at both venues: Forests, Woods and Groves: Art from the Arborealists by Philippa Beale (Batsford, 2024); Art Meets

Ecology: Arborealists in Lady Park Wood by George Peterken with Tim Craven and Christiana Payne (Sansom and Company, 2020); and The Arborealists at Staverton Park, Tim Craven's catalogue of this year's exhibition at the Minories, Colchester.

The artists: Georgina Allen, Robert Amesbury Brooks, Rosalind Archer, Suzanne Baker, Philippa Beale, John Blandy, Day Bowman, Frank Creber, Margy Creber, Louisa Crispin, Annabel Cullen, Alex Egan, Ferha Farooqui, Laura Gompertz, Julie Held, Joanna Hyslop, Charlie Kirkham, Claire Leach, Natasha Lien, Dawn Limbert, Anna Maconochie, Seema Manchanda, Sarah Medway, Hilary Rosen, Angela Rumble, Tom Shipman, Maria Storey, Sandra Wroe.
